

This film is presented as a two screens immersive installation that is an hour long. Although each film is independent, some parts of each film match scenes; however, they are shot from different points of view.

Both films contain four distinct scenes. Scene 1 in both films begins with Karl shaving and then cuts to him dressing, and then writing upon the wall. Here we are only presented with ambient noise and silence.

The film begins to split in direction with Karl reciting a poem about Elizabeth Taylor on one screen whilst the second screen shows a part of his studio, then him, in a café, flicking through magazines. The scene ends with Karl reciting a short poem from a book. We are smothered in the ambient sound of his environment. The aural experience moves between shots and screens as the films drift in and out of synchronicity. Interspersed ideas and thoughts of Karl Holmqvist are presented as texts suggesting the content of 'as-of-that-time' unmade film, thus playing with the ideas of fact and fiction, truth and desire.
